The geek's best friend is probably the keyboard... But the mouse is not that far away, too ! Enjoy some mouse wallpaper. I've downloaded a few free programs, and although I've never had a serious problem with them, I can't recommend it sincerely if you work with a famous person. Research has found too many disaster stories of people who unwittingly downloaded malware or viruses, and the truth is that even with internet searches through McAfee or the like, you just can't guarantee the security of your programs. The most important lesson? If you're going to do this, make a thorough suspension first. Related articles broadband Buddy. Is free software safe? Exploring a free alternative. 2012. (September 7, 2012) Advertising Mrs. Lynn wants to know how she can download the software and be sure that she is not getting something malicious. There's no way to be sure, but a few precautions can greatly reduce the chance. First, only download from reputable sites such as pcworld.com (sorry for the fork, but this is really a reputable site). Tucows, Jumbo and Download.com are also reliable. Another option: If you know which program you want, go to your own website of this program. If the program itself is not malicious, it is unlikely to be infected there. If you're browsing with Firefox 3, you have extra protection. The browser scans the downloads - using its own antivirus software - before it lets you get to the file. And when talking about your own antivirus software, always keep it up to date. This should -- and in most cases, probably - stop you from discovering anything evil.
